CLASS NOTES

concluded as 'subordinate' of Dravidians by Hyde-Argans (Kennedy). (165)

The Harappan-Aryan Relation :-

From the 2nd half of 19th century to the beginning of 20th century, the beginning of Indian History was considered from the Vedic Age but the discovery of Harappan Civilization by R.D. Banerjee at that time director of ASI John Marshall, all the older theories/hypotheses were challenged. Since Harappan civilization was developed, Urbanised, civilized & better structured than the Vedic culture which was a rural culture. This brought a new debate in Indian history about relationship b/w Harappan & Aryans. This debate hinges on several factors for the 1st point of discussion it is what was the time of migration of Aryans into India? This has led to two different schools of thought which are popularly known as

Urbanisation :-

In the present day context, 'Urbanisation' can be defined easily on certain grounds such as infrastructure, population etc but in historical context it is very tough for archaeologists to identify the urban settlements. Since beginning the archaeologists are debating on the features which identify the urban settlements.

Q1. The early medieval period in India was not the period of 'disintegration' only but the period of 'integration' as well. Explain. (15 Marks)

→ The early medieval period was much ignored in the academics due to the imperialist scholars not finding any change in the period. However, it has been an important period of debate in Indian history today. The different approaches developed to study this period are:

① Dark Age model - Propounded by Imperial schools based on Marx's Asiatic mode of production which favours "changelessness", so considered the period as the Dark Age where no economic progress, no social transformation was there.

② Feudal model - Indian Marxist historians counter the "changelessness" in Indian Early Medieval period propounds that there was also a Feudalism as a core feature of the society during this period in India. The idea
